Parliament backs programme to shield children from online risks

Parliament approved a proposal calling for a national programme to protect children from the growing risks associated with excessive and unmonitored use of modern technology, particularly smartphones.

The decision reflects broad concern over the social and psychological impact of digital exposure on younger age groups and marks a shift from debate to concrete action.

The approved proposal frames children's exposure to technology as a national responsibility rather than a private family matter.

While acknowledging the role of digital tools in developing skills and innovation, MPs agreed that unchecked use has contributed to behavioural, psychological and social challenges that can no longer be ignored.

During deliberations, attention was drawn to a range of threats facing children online, including cyberbullying, psychological distress, blackmail and the misuse of personal images.

MPs stressed that these risks have intensified as children spend longer periods online without adequate supervision or structured alternatives during their free time.

The proposed national programme aims to offer practical alternatives to screen dependency by expanding organised after school activities, educational initiatives and community based programmes.

Schools and activity centres are expected to play a central role in engaging children in productive environments that reduce reliance on digital devices.

MP Muneer Ebrahim Seroor underlined the need for shared responsibility, emphasising that families, schools and public institutions must work together to safeguard children from digital harm.

He noted that awareness alone is insufficient without structured programmes that guide children towards healthier routines.
