Personnel were deployed to 864 areas by the General Directorate of Civil Defence to extinguish fires caused by the burning of agricultural waste. Speaking on the Interior Ministry’s Al Aman social media programme, Hidd Police Station Head Colonel Dr. Osama Bahar highlighted the environmental, health and safety risks linked to the practice. Col. Dr. Bahar said many people had previously believed that burning agricultural waste in Bahrain and elsewhere supported agricultural development.

Studies

However, he explained that studies had proven otherwise, noting that the practice reduced soil quality by up to 25 per cent, forcing farmers to spend additional funds on fertilisers and vitamins to restore land fertility and support healthy plant growth. Seven million people worldwide have been affected by severe illnesses and deaths caused by exposure to microscopic particles known as PM2.5, released through the burning of agricultural waste, Col. Dr. Osama Bahar warned, adding that the process emitted black carbon that posed serious health risks. He further stressed that fires caused by agricultural waste burning were not confined to waste alone, but often spread to crops farmers were trying to protect. In some cases, the flames extended to outbuildings and even residential houses located on farms.

Fires

He noted that while farmers may have intended to manage waste responsibly, the fires frequently became uncontrollable, resulting in the loss of crops and essential structures. Col. Dr. Bahar concluded by urging farmers to adopt safer alternatives, emphasising that recycling agricultural waste was a more secure solution than risking the loss of crops or homes. “The use and recycling of agricultural waste is a safer solution, instead of risking the loss of crops or homes,” he said.

The practice of burning agricultural waste reduced soil quality by up to 25 per cent.

A nurse accused of draining BD25,000.750 from the bank account of a disabled Bahraini man by using his mobile phone has appeared before the High Criminal Court. The court heard she allegedly moved the cash from his account to her own phone, then sent it on to an account in her Asian home country. Prosecutors said BD3,500 was later paid back after the transfers were spotted, leaving the rest unpaid.

Hearing

High Criminal Court adjourned hearing the case to 20 January so the defendant can be brought from custody and her lawyer can present a defence. The Public Prosecution claims the defendant used the ing his money transfer app account without legal right and entering authentication details to complete the transactions. The case came to light after the victim’s son checked his father’s bank activity and found large transfers made between September and October 2025, the court was told.

Money

The money, totalling BD25,000.750, went to the account of the worker employed as his father’s nurse. Prosecutors said the defendant admitted taking the man’s phone without his knowledge, sending the money in instalments to her account in Bahrain and then transferring the full amount abroad. A report from the transfer service, submitted to the court, said the transactions were carried out using the victim’s phone, that the device linked to the transfers belonged to the defendant, and that the one-time codes needed to finish the transfers were sent to her own number.
