An Aramco fuel tank near Riyadh's airport on fire

AFP

An Aramco fuel tank near Riyadh's international airport caught fire on Saturday, according to an AFP journalist, after people in the city reported hearing explosions.

Firefighters were seen trying to extinguish the flames of a burnt-out fuel tank with the Saudi oil giant Aramco logo appearing on the structure.

Aircraft tracking website FlightRadar24 on Saturday reported major issues at the Saudi capital's Riyadh King Khalid International Airport, including cancellations and delays, after residents saw smoke and flames near the site.

The airport was listed under the site's maximum disruption index of 5.0, meaning the airport was experiencing "major problems with long delays and several cancelled flights".

The disruption followed an overnight air raid alert issued by Saudi authorities, the first since fighting in neighbouring Yemen intensified this month.

A fuel tank belonging to Saudi oil giant Aramco caught fire near Riyadh's King Khalid International Airport on Saturday, hours after Saudi authorities issued an air raid alert for the capital amid escalating fighting involving Yemen's Houthi militants.

An AFP journalist at the scene reported seeing firefighters attempting to extinguish flames engulfing a burnt-out fuel tank bearing the Aramco logo. Residents across Riyadh also reported hearing a number of explosions after the overnight alerts.

Saudi authorities had urged residents in Riyadh and other areas to remain indoors before issuing an all-clear on Saturday morning. The alert was the first such warning for Riyadh since fighting in neighbouring Yemen intensified this month.

The cause of the fire had not been officially confirmed.

The incident also caused major disruption at Riyadh's airport. Aircraft tracking website FlightRadar24 placed King Khalid International Airport at its highest disruption level, 5.0, indicating major problems, long delays and several cancelled flights.

The disruption came as smoke and flames were reported near the airport, affecting flight operations at one of Saudi Arabia's main aviation hubs.

The latest developments followed an escalation in fighting between the Houthis and Saudi-backed forces in Yemen. The Houthis have previously carried out attacks targeting Saudi territory and warned that reported Saudi military operations would not go unanswered.

The growing tensions have raised concerns over Saudi oil infrastructure, regional aviation and vital shipping routes, adding to wider uncertainty across the Middle East.

Iraq Returns Restricted Western Airspace to Civil Aviation

Iraq has returned restricted airspace across the western part of the country to civilian authorities, ending military-use limitations that had been in place since 2016, the Transport Ministry said on Friday.

The ministry said previously reserved airspace zones stretching from northern to southern western Iraq had been handed over to the authority responsible for airports and air navigation.

The move is expected to give aviation authorities greater flexibility to redesign flight routes, ease restrictions on aircraft movements and improve the efficiency of Iraqi airspace.

The restricted zones were established for military operations against Daesh in 2016 and 2017, when large areas of Iraq's western desert were used for coalition operations.

Ehab Saad Karim, director of the General Company for Airports and Air Navigation Management, said the military air zones listed in Iraq's aeronautical guide were no longer being used for military operations.

Karim said the decision followed years of technical and institutional work to improve air traffic flow and efficiency. The reopening of the routes is expected to increase aviation revenues, improve civilian air traffic and support the national economy.

Transport Ministry spokesperson Hussein Ahmed told Reuters that the remaining technical and regulatory procedures are expected to be completed by October 1.

The ministry said the move is also linked to the withdrawal of remaining us-led international coalition forces from Iraq.
