- B ahrain International Circuit's complex is located in the middle of the desert on a former camel farm and features 1,120 palm trees.
- Despite the track's rural location, surrounded by sandy desert, the sand does not present the cars with any major issues and the circuit surface can clean up very quickly.
- 495 lighting posts are used to illuminate the track for FP2, Qualifying and the 57-lap race.
- Bahrain International Circuit has one of the roughest surfaces of the season, which can lead to higher tyre degradation as a result.
- Turn 10 is one of the trickiest corners because it has a long, combined corner-entry that gets tighter towards the apex, which is blind over a crest. Drivers begin to apply the brakes while also negotiating the wide corner arc of Turn
- 9 and the track drops away at the apex. All of these factors cause the front-left tyre to go light and increase the risk of a lock-up. The balance is on a knife-edge through this sequence, as drivers battle cornering and braking, which is why there are often mistakes at this point on
- Because FP1 and FP3 are run in daylight, they hold little value when it comes to car balance and set-up work for Qualifying and the race, which take place at night. However, FP1 and FP3 can still prove useful for work on other items such as testing new parts or understanding the
- FP2 is a crucial session for the teams, in order to properly prepare for the race weekend's main

- When it comes to set-up, the focus is very much on tuning the car for low and medium-speed corners, because the high-speed sections of track are easily taken flat-out. Mechanical grip is an important area in Bahrain, to propel the cars out of the slow turns.
- Bahrain International Circuit has the jointsecond highest gear change figure per lap of the 2020 season, with drivers shifting gear 58 times. This is behind Sochi and tied with Abu Dhabi.
- The Bahrain Grand Prix is always punishing on the brakes, with seven braking events and three of those being classified as 'heavy' by engineers, meaning the driver is braking for 0.4 seconds or longer, with 4G or more. The Sakhir Grand Prix, which will be around the Bahrain International Circuit's Outer Track, is expected to be even tougher on the brakes.
