

Court story

Arab man sentenced to 10 years in jail for trafficking teenager

TDT | Manama

The High Criminal Court convicted an Arab man of trafficking a 19-year-old girl from his home country by luring her with a fake job offer in Bahrain and then forcing her into prostitution.

He was sentenced to 10 years of imprisonment and fined BD5,000, while a complicit Arab woman was sentenced to five years for participating in coercing the victim.

The court also fined her BD5,000 and ordered the pair to be deported from the country and to bear the expenses of returning the victim home.

Public Prosecution investigations revealed that the victim had come to work as a receptionist in a hotel.

The first defendant received her, took her passport and sheltered her in his residence for two days before moving her to a hotel to meet with the second defendant, who informed her that she would work in prostitution.

When the victim contacted the first defendant, he urged her to give it a try since she couldn't return to her country alone.

She met a number of clients while the second defendant took the profits and handed them to the first defendant.

Eventually, the victim suffered from fatigue.

A Gulf national she met decided to take her to the doctor but the second defendant refused and informed the first defendant, who took the victim to his residence. There, he beat her with a belt and verbally threatened her demanding that she continues working. He moved her to another hotel.

The victim was once more forced to meet with clients until the Gulf national took her contact number and learned her whereabouts. She confronted the first defendant to return her passport so that she may return home, but he refused. The Gulf national then reported where she was being held.

Investigations confirmed that the first defendant lured the victim to Bahrain with a false promise of employment. He received her at the Bahrain International Airport and then checked her into several hotels where he forced her to practise prostitution.

He transported her between two hotels in addition to housing her in his residence. He physically assaulted her when she refused work and withheld her passport to prevent her escape, using these means to exploit her youth and vulnerability.

Beware of fraud calls as scammers are now targeting booster vaccines in Bahrain.

Expatriate communities are spreading messages on social media platforms, warning others not to accept such calls or links and to confirm their legitimacy.

In a recent scam, scammers pose as Health Ministry employees and ask victims for information about their vaccinations to provide them with a ministry-issued certificate. Once the victims provide the information, scammers are able to hack their phone and obtain bank account information.

The Daily Tribune has been carrying many reports in the last few months about fraudsters targeting the online banking and financial transaction network in the Kingdom.

The released articles detailed the suffering of many Bahrainis and expatriates who collectively lost thousands of dinars to scammers. The majority of the victims have complained to the police, pleading with them to assist them in recovering their money.

Speaking to The Daily Tribune, Ambika Mass, an expat and victim of a vaccination scam, said: "I got a call for vaccination to register and take the vaccine, but this time the guy sent me a link and instructed me to download and input details. After leaving for work and returning home to look for my phone, I noticed that the Beware App had sent me a lot of messages and that my bank had informed me that I had lost BD250.

"I gathered my bank information, took screenshots of every communication, and went to the Crime Investigation Department (CID). They claimed they would look into the situation, but there has been no response as of yet, and I have lost BD250. It is a large sum of money, equivalent to a monthly income.

"I'm still getting calls and mails about the booster vaccines right now. Not just myself, but many others are contacting me to claim they are in the same predicament. I plead with the authorities to intervene and provide instructions on how to stop these calls from coming to us."

It is learnt that many banks are flooded with calls from frantic customers saying that their money has been stolen by scammers after hacking their bank account or fund transfer system.

The citizens had been warned against impersonation attacks which contain links pointing to legitimate websites that are often used by organisations, stressing the importance of individuals and companies taking all necessary measures to avoid cybercrimes.
